THE ECAC AND WOMEN'S LACROSSE

The 1984 season marks the first attempt by the Eastern College Athletic Conference (ECAC) at hosting lacrosse championships for women at all three divisional levels.

In the recently completed Division I regional at Loyola University in Maryland, the University of New Hampshire downed the University of Massachusetts 8-4 to win the ECAC title and an automatic berth in the NCAA Division I Women's Lacrosse Championships on May 19-20 at Boston University. James Madison University and Loyola were the other two participants in the ECAC Regional.

This weekend, the ECAC Division II Regional will be decided between the University of Maryland-Baltimore County (UMBC) and St. Michael's College from Winooski, Vermont. Another Div. III regional -- the New England Regional -- is being contested between Plymouth State of New Hampshire and Bates College from Lewiston, Maine.

Given the results from this season, the Mid-Atlantic Regional, with Widener University, Cortland State, Frostburg State and Mary Washington College, is undoubtedly the strongest of the ECAC lacrosse tournaments outside Division I.

And rightfully so..

The Mid-Atlantic Region spans the geographic heart of collegiate women's lacrosse in the United States. The 1984 selections reflect this scope -- Mary Washington College from Virginia, Frostburg State from Maryland, Widener University from Southeast Pennsylvania and Cortland State from Central New York.

The ECAC

The Nation's Largest Athletic Conference

The Eastern College Athletic Conference is a voluntary association of 233 colleges and universities throughout New England, the Middle Atlantic states, Virginia, the District of Columbia and into North Carolina. Institutions of every size and composition are members — from the largest state-supported universities to the small private or church affiliated colleges, lending the conference an unparalleled diversity in membership.

This unique variety in philosophy and difference in focus from the accepted definition of the "college conference" gives the ECAC a rare place in the annals of collegiate athletic administration.

A Conference of conferences, the ECAC umbrella covers dozens of playing conferences and other associations. From the Big East and the Ivy League to the Pennsylvania and New Jersey State Conferences and the New England Small College Athletic Conference, schools which compose those leagues also hold membership in the ECAC.

It is through this strong, traditional affiliation of the member schools and their individual conferences that the ECAC has been able to rise to its powerful role on the national collegiate spectrum. Since nearly 30% of the National Collegiate Athletic Association is made up of ECAC members, the ECAC has a prime ability to speak as a unified voice on intercollegiate athletic matters and play a leading role in the development of national athletic policy and action.

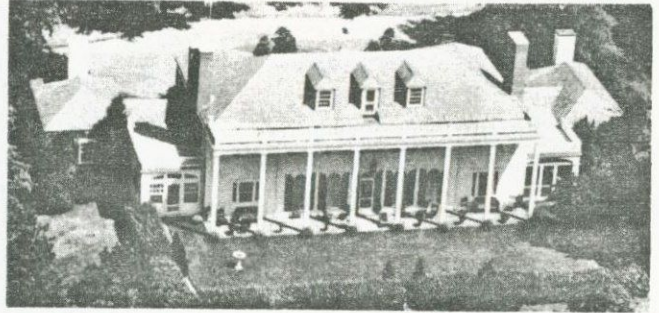

From the viewpoints of both philosophy and personnel, the ECAC and its impact upon the NCAA is well documented. The ECAC and its member colleges have been prime movers toward the development of the sense of divisional unity and self-direction which the NCAA now enjoys. Boston College athletic director William J. Flynn has served both as NCAA and ECAC President to head the list of prominent ECAC supporters who have also served important leadership roles throughout the NCAA.

The ECAC was founded in 1938 as the Central Office for Eastern Intercollegiate Athletics. And from the start, the conference, under the leadership of its first Commissioner, Asa S. Bushnell, addressed the concerns of its members in the same responsive fashion which remains today. The Central Office helped create order out of the often chaotic and tempestuous eastern collegiate athletic administrative scene of the 1930s. As responsibilities were handled by the Central Office, the member colleges saved time, money and effort and had certain vital aspects of their administration handled efficiently.

Perhaps the most critical of these matters was and remains to be the assignment of officials for the member institution's contests. Prior to the founding of the Central Office, this chore was handled on a piecemeal, institutional basis, without the consistency and sense of fair judgment necessary. Upon accepting this challenge from its members, the ECAC has become responsible for the recruiting, training, evaluating and assigning of varsity and junior varsity officials in 13 different sports. In addition to the work required to produce over 15,000 officiating assignments annually, the ECAC has taken a primary role in the re-assignment process and the verification of schedules among its member colleges and affiliated officials.

The ECAC assigns officials for regular season and championship events in the sports of baseball, basketball, fencing, football, gymnastics, hockey, soccer and wrestling, as well as for the ECAC affiliate championships in cross country, indoor and outdoor track, crew and swimming.

In addition, the ECAC professionally manages numerous championship tournaments for its member colleges. In particular, the Division I regional basketball, hockey and baseball tournaments and the Division II hockey tournament earn their winners automatic berths into the NCAA championships. The ECAC sponsors championships in soccer, tennis, lacrosse and golf, one of the largest amateur golf championships in the nation. And starting in 1982-83 the ECAC will, for the first time, sponsor championships in sports for women student-athletes. The ECAC office also helps manage the championship tournaments of its affiliates in cross country and track (ICAAAA and Heptagonals), wrestling (Eastern Intercollegiate Wrestling Association), fencing (Intercollegiate Fencing Association), swimming (Eastern Intercollegiate Swimming League), crew (Eastern Association of Rowing Colleges and the Intercollegiate Rowing Association), and gymnastics (Eastern Intercollegiate Gymnastics League).

The Asa Bushnell Center — ECAC Headquarters

Traditionally, the Eastern College Athletic Conference has helped establish, interpret and enforce certain standards of eligibility for the individual student-athlete at the member institutions. An important element of that eligibility counsel has come in the persons who have served on the eligibility committees of both the ECAC and the NCAA.

The Eastern College Athletic Conference helps promote and encourage interest in the intercollegiate athletic programs through the work of the Service Bureau, an information service which handles public relations, publications and administers the various all-star selection processes.

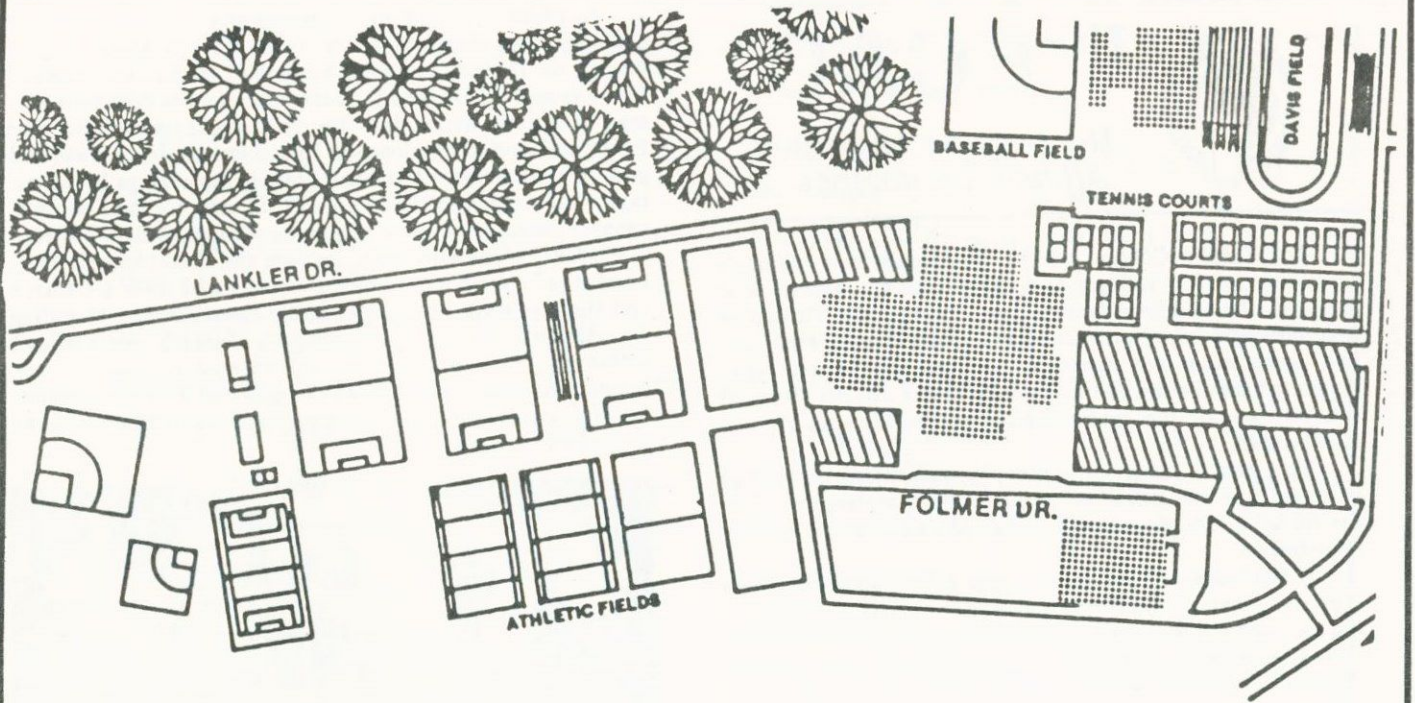

An annual fixture is the Schedule-Making Session and Convention, during which a great deal of business and communication about common concerns takes place. The scheduling session affords the conference athletic administrators the opportunity to fill out their future schedules with fellow ECAC members — colleges with like athletic and academic philosophies through the expanse of the ECAC geographical region — at a tremendous time saving.

The ECAC is currently staffed by 15 full-time employees with a part-time officials' supervisory staff of 15. Under the direction of its third Commissioner, Robert M. "Scotty" Whitelaw, the ECAC has a rich administrative tradition. Whitelaw replaced former Commissioner George Shiebler in 1972, after the long-term associate of Bushnell's had succeeded the inaugural ECAC Commissioner for 2 years. Bushnell, widely recognized as one of the premier amateur athletic administrators in American history, served as Commissioner for 32 years.

The ECAC's current headquarters, the Asa S. Bushnell Center, located in Centerville, MA on Cape Cod, and named after the Conference's founding father and first Commissioner, was dedicated in 1974. Prior to the move to the Cape, the ECAC had been situated in New York City, originally in the Hotel Roosevelt, then the Hotel Biltmore, briefly in the Military Park Hotel in Newark, NJ, before 16 years in the Royal Manhattan Hotel.

The ECAC, the nation's largest athletic conference, remains unique in its tradition, diversity and service.
